New concepts and insights from the world of washrooms

Serene spaces

Susie Atkinson, interior designer

Your bathroom should be a sanctuary. It's the place you retreat to every day and an opportunity to have time to yourself. Bathrooms by their nature tend to have cold surfaces - flooring is often stone or tiles, and fittings are usually white enamel - yet the one thing you don't want to feel in a bathroom is cold. I always like to ensure bathrooms feel warm and relaxing, and there are a few ways to go about this. On a literal level, it's important to put in underfloorheating, wherever possible. Consider what you want in your bathroom and how you want to use it. I recently designed a bathtub with Drummonds and had a particular vision in mind for it - a relaxing soak while looking out the window into a garden. As a result, the Whitewater bathishigherthanmost, and shallower, with a really good back to it so it's unbelievably comfortable to sit in.

I often think it's nice to have not everything specified from a bathroom supplier. Perhaps pick out an antique mirror, or a pair of IP-rated wall lights from elsewhere.

Focus on the textures - wood is lovely in bathrooms, though you need to have a generously-sized space to avoid water damage. Introduce colour through towels and bath mats or slubby linen fabric at the window.

Class act

Add a little character to your bathroom with vintage-style details. It might be an antique cabinet repurposed as a vanity unit or even new products that give a nod to period bathrooms – such as this traditional-style towel rail from Drummonds, which takes centre stage in front of a dark navy backdrop.

Do the double

The luxurious addition of a Jack and Jill vanity unit can work well, even in a smaller space. 'We wanted this en suite to have an art deco, luxe feel,' says interior designer Laura Stephens. A double basin sits on a brass frame, which allows the decorative flooring and walls to be seen, providing a sense of space.
